

It's not hard to get hung up on the "hangings" as Pat Jordan and Lynda Charles demonstrate at the Beta Barndance.

Dance brings barn down

"It's barn dance time!"

That familiar cry heard each year is that of the Betas of OU. It is the announcement of the annual old party: the Beta Barndance.

What's a Beta Barndance? It's a week of fun and fellowship for the membership of Beta Theta Pi.

As any Beta would agree, Barndance is more than just a party. It is a tradition that unites both active members and alums in a week-long celebration of fraternal kinship.

For more than 40 years, the Barndance has been the highlight of activities at 800 Chautauqua, making it one of the oldest celebrations on campus.

Each year a different class takes pride in building a life-size barn on the front yard, which becomes the focal point of the week's festivities.

The building process commences on Sunday evening and continues until Wednesday night when more than 100 Betas go western to serenade the university's sororities.

By Thursday, the Barn and its accompanying decorations are complete and everyone takes off for a peaceful evening in the nearby countryside.

By Friday, when classes are over, the weekend begins with a campfire and country music at a local farmhouse.

High noon Saturday marks partytime for the entire campus as a few hours of entertainment is highlighted.

The climax of the week is Saturday night's party at the Beta house. A band supplies the rock-n-roll music, while members and their dates enjoy the decorations and good times in their home-made barn.

As the evening draws to a close, everyone participates in the barn-breaking festivities, tearing down the barn to its original condition...a pile of lumber.
